Abstract	There is a difference in the experience of children with developmental disabilities in terms of exercise and sports experience compared to children with typical development. Among them, parent-child recreation activities were conducted for parent and child of children with developmental disabilities through new sports experiences, and the practical reports were made. In addition, we investigated parents' thoughts on parent and child activities and examined the nature of parent and child activities. Interest in parent and child activities is high, and opportunities to participate are sought, and the significance of new sports experiences is considered to be very high because they are easy to experience and provide opportunities to learn about new sports.
