Abstract	This paper is a case study of psychotherapy for a second grade student in a junior high school, who committed a theft of underwear during the period that he was not attending the school. The client was temporarily detained by a child guidance center, then moved to a children's self-reliance support facility that referred him to the school counselor. The series of interviews started as visiting sessions at the facility and eventually moved to the school he attended. The client expressed himself mainly using music image. The paper discusses the following three points; 1. Things that were expressed through music, 2. Music as a corridor and as function of 'building a bridge', 3. Relationship between client and therapist.
keyword	a sexual delinquency, adolescence, masculinity
