Abstract	This study aims to clarify the health support needs of welfare recipients in order to narrow the gap of health status disparity, and examine the support system. The study not only classifies health support needs based on health policies, academic papers, and administrative statistics material but also considers the future support system. The review of the health support needs of welfare recipients revealed that poverty is a high social risk and has a negative influence on health. Low participation rates in health examinations, mental disorders and suicide rates, and lifestyle-related diseases are relevant issues; decision-making support, such as that for long-term care and end-of-life care, has also become a concern. For a support system that responds to the health support needs of welfare recipients, firstly, it is necessary to develop support for enhancing health literacy with a viewpoint of comprehensive support on which health support is based. Secondly, it is necessary to strengthen a coordination (particularly between livelihood and health support), reinforcing the ability to professionally execute activities in case work. Finally, a community-based integrated support system must be built through public-private partnership as well as policy collaborations in administrative fields, such as health, medical care, welfare, and education.
