Abstract	The purpose of this study was to visualize the factors and processes that lead Students with work experience to choose to study in a junior college of childcare training schools. Semi-structured interviews were conducted with 14 subjects and their data was analyzed using the Trajectory Equifinality Model. As a result, three processes were extracted: [image of childcare], [formation of motivation to become a childcare worker], and [Choosing to learn as students with work experience]. The results suggest that it is necessary to focus on the [formation of motivation to become a childcare worker] as a selection process.
