Abstract	Purpose and Method: in order to evaluate the possible improvements in the care service practice in relation to the prevention of elderly abuse, we have conducted a survey targeted at care workers and have identified issues related to abuse prevention and the care-workers' lack of recognition toward the quality of care service they provide. Results: years of experience are not required in order for care workers to be aware of the necessity of improvement about abuse include mistreatment, but in order to identify each abuse, care workers need to develop knowledge or skills through experience and qualification as a professional. However, to create improvements within care services, the care workers' "awareness" toward issues plays a significant role. For example, the rate of participation of care workers in abuse-prevention-oriented programs such as "reviewing the care plan" or "re-organizing services within institutions," is not as high as other training programs in general. This is a problem to be addressed if we are to improve the care service industry in general. Conclusion: in order to improve care services for the prevention of abuse, the framework or methods to tackle the issues of individual assistance or the re-organization of services should be developed starting with the "awareness" of the care workers.
