Abstract	In this case study, we report on the case of a boy whose behavior became more positive and whose parents' anxiety was reduced through support activities. In addition, we re-examined how to provide appropriate support to children with developmental disorders and their guardians, and discussed future activities. As a result, it was found that it is important not only for this case but also for how to build a support network with the families and communities (schools, etc.) in the background of the child.
keyword	developmental disorders, support network
