Abstract	[Objective] This study aimed to examine the circumstances surrounding and challenges in family support and community-based services for dementia in Saga Prefecture through analysis of efforts made in Nakatsu City, Oita Prefecture, which is an advanced region of dementia cafés. [Methods] The author made a research trip to Nakatsu City, Oita Prefecture, and collected and analyzed relevant documents. [Results]The reason why advanced efforts were made lies in the fact that a social welfare corporation with a long-established social welfare practice has played a central role in the efforts. The efforts to run a dementia café are positioned as an extension of previous initiatives including community-based practices and personnel training. In addition, some activities have been implemented in advance by collaboration among the public administration, nursing care service, medical associations, and operators. In Saga Prefecture, on the other hand, organizations such as nursing care service operators and family associations have just begun to work on the dementia café project as a new approach to community based services and family support. [Discussion] It is important for a dementia café to focus on the viewpoint of “living” in “the place where people with dementia continue to live.” Therefore, dementia cafés are derived from an extension of welfare and health care practices in communities, and have shown diverse expansions. Future development of dementia cafés is expected as an important effort to connect people in the local community and promote dementia prevention.
