Abstract	As population declines in regional cities, so-called "city disappearance" may occur. While urban concentration of population is unavoidable from an industrial perspective, the paper also considered the current situation in which regional cities themselves are being forgotten due to a decline in the number of people visiting them. Based on this, the paper took up the grave-keeping service as a measure to prevent disappearance in regional cities (using the Hirado City Social Welfare Council, a social welfare corporation, as an example), and linked community welfare and urban studies in an interdisciplinary manner. In conclusion, the effects of the grave-keeping service may not be seen for 50 or 100 years, but the paper cited the "provision of spiritual peace of mind" for users.
