Abstract	As Hoshino points out, since the Meiji period in Japan, it has been common for graves to be patrilineal and managed by the eldest son's family. However, in modern times, when only children marry each other, the child's household exercises the right to manage the grave and perform rituals such as memorial services in the wife's family home. Also, considering the average life expectancy, if the man dies first, the wife will manage both the graves of her husband and wife. This perspective has been presented as an interdisciplinary overview from the perspectives of urban studies, sociology of religion, and women's studies.
