Abstract	Major changes are required in the environment in which children have created a diversity of demands in childcare to which kindergartens, nurseries, and childcare facilities must cater, as well as demands for the “socialization of childcare”. Among these, this study focuses on the care of sick and recovering children as part of childcare, particularly demanded by parents, guardians, and society. This paper discusses the current status and problems of this kind of care, specialization of childcare workers involved, and future directions. While care of sick and recovering children is critical in our society, it is not as widely known as it should be. Furthermore, such particular care presently involves various issues and challenges, such as managerial problems and assignment of childcare workers. With a focus on the specialization required of childcare workers involved, this study aims to examine which specialization is actually demanded of these workers and investigate the future directions.
