Abstract	This study describes the psychotherapy process with a male junior high school student who had visited the school counsellor on grounds of poor physical health. The client was having difficulties not only in daily life but also in extracurricular activities, namely, individual competition. As regards the background reasons for the client's problems, the relationship between the client and his father was hypothesized. The father tended to compel the son to listen to what he said. Some of the father's children went along with this, but the client did not. The self-assertive client used his strength in the therapy process to deftly confront his father. As a result, the client not only changed but the father took up a new position. In the study, investigation was carried out from three perspectives: (1) about changes of the client and his father, (2) the client's power, and (3) the client as an athlete.
