Abstract	On March 11, 2011, an unprecedented earthquake and tsunami hit eastern Japan. Subsequently, a nuclear power plant accident occurred, causing extensive damage. This large-scale disaster forced many victims to evacuate to other parts of the country away from their hometown. This study aimed to review the progress of a support group for evacuees to outside the prefecture, focusing on two points: (1) the realities of the hardships and conflicts faced by evacuees to outside the prefecture, and (2) the roles and functions played by support groups for these evacuees. Based on the progress of this case study, the various hardships experienced by evacuees to outside the prefecture were revealed. These included: "the hardship of having to make their own choices and decisions about their future lives", in an uncertain situation. "the hardship caused by various divisions," and "the complicated grief caused by ambiguous loss." The results suggested that, for refugees outside the prefecture, the group functioned as a place that supported the process of acquiring a new community and of seeking and reconstructing rebuilding their own ways of life for the future.
