Abstract	The study reports psychotherapy sessions with a preadolescent female with latent schizophrenia, using a passage from a book suggested by the client. Phase I focused on acceptance. The client struggled in accepting support provided by the ward staff, doctor, and others. Phase II focused on hallucinations and delusions. A transformation process, unavoidable in the client's individuation process, was observed. Phase III focused on confronting the father. The client was made to face her father, whom she felt was threatening. Phase IV focused on the separation of family and therapist's relationship. retirement. During sessions, a word collage was made from the book presented by the client; this was investigated along with other images, and the meaning of the word collage was also investigated. The study also looked into the transference/counter-transference relationship between the client and the therapist, as well as the guilt felt by the therapist towards the client.
