Abstract	This study aimed to clarify the changes in the cognitive state of caregivers of elderly women at the beginning of the care and the time of assessment and to identify issues related to cognitive caregiving appraisal at each time point. The respondents were the elderly women's sons, daughters, and husbands who are their immediate caregivers. A total of 286 questionnaires were mailed to the respondents and 94 completed questionnaires (32.9% return rate) were returned. The caregivers who responded to the questionnaire were 12 sons, 54 daughters, 24 husbands, and 4 others. In all, 90 responses were analyzed. The survey items were condition of the care recipients, working situation of the caregivers, presence or absence of an alternative, economic situation, and relationship with the care recipients. The dependent variable was the cognitive caregiving appraisal scale. The results are as follows. (1) After a period of care, the negative caregiving appraisal did not change, but all positive caregiving appraisal significantly elevated. (2) The husbands of care recipients reported increased "anxiety about continuing caregiving," and the daughters of care recipients reported increased "fulfillment about the caregiving roles" and "affection for the elderly." (3) Sons of care recipients were at risk of caring for multiple recipients.(4) Both negative and positive appraisals were related to the degree of respect the caregivers had for the care recipients. (5) Satisfaction with support from neighbors and friends was related to cognitive caregiving appraisal. It is important for care professionals to properly assess the relationship between the caregivers, the care recipients, and the social support network in place.
