Abstract	Although the teaching style differed from that of previous years, we continued to conduct surveys to understand new students and improve classes by digital media. It is difficult to compare directly between the results of this year and other years because the circumstances differ and the method of the survey is different. Nevertheless, the results showed that there was no significant change in the origin or motivation for entering the university, nor was there a significant difference in the opinions and impressions of all students in all departments regarding the classes they were taking. We also conducted another survey to explore the future of remote classes, which will significantly impact the future of university education. The results revealed the following: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1) There was a difference in the students' IT environment. 2) The students' devices to attend remote class were divided into personal computers, tablets, and smartphones. 3) Opinions on the use of remote classes were positive, but there were also requests for improvement. 4) The results of the comparison between students using smartphones only and those using computers and tablets showed differences in the clarity of the screen, the progress of the class, and the understanding of the class. The score was significantly lower than those of the smartphone-only use. 5) Some students mentioned the advantages of remote classes, whereas others were concerned about acquiring friends and mutual enlightenment. Based on these result, we discussed the notion of ideal remote classes and what might represent the ideal university education in the future.
