Abstract	In this paper, we conducted a questionnaire survey of foreign students residing in Japan and estimated the factors that influenced the choice of destination. The survey focused on Chinese and Vietnamese students who are the most popular countries of origin for foreign students. Similar to the result shown in previous studies, the factors for choosing a career path differed depending on the nationality of the international student. On the other hand, when selecting a study abroad destination, it became clear that factors such as the environment, facilities, and security tend to be more important than the recommendations of study abroad agents, family and friends. From this result, it was shown that the career choices of international students tend to be more personalized.
