Abstract	Using the example of Hirado City, Nagasaki Prefecture, a regional city that is experiencing significant depopulation due to the aging of the population, the role and future of proxy grave-keeping services was presented. The presentation emphasized the interdisciplinary nature of urban studies with sociology and social welfare studies, and led to the conclusion that population decline also has an impact on urban issues, and that increasing the number of people visiting the city is important, with proxy grave-keeping services playing a part in this study.
