Abstract	As Hoshino (2014) points out, since the Meiji period, gravesite management has generally been "patrilineal, with the eldest son's family managing the grave." With the concentration of population in large cities, the eldest son's family, whose gravesite is in a regional city, can also live in the regional city, and because of the average life expectancy, it is common for the wife to manage the gravesite after the husband's death. This is the role of women in modern regional cities (exercising religious rights), and is linked to annual memorial services, grave guarding, and grave closure. This presentation clarified, using case studies from two cities in the Kyushu region, that the exercise of women's religious rights is essential in modern society.
