Abstract	We examined the learning-theoretical characteristics of various community exchange activities that have been ongoing from the past, and considered their educational significance. Taking the activities of Nishikyushu University Junior College as an example, we took a bird's-eye view of the background, purpose and aim of the activities, and their learning outcomes. It is judged that the activity is an opportunity for meta-learning (mental procedure of knowledge) for building relationships, and the pillar is human resource development in the region. For junior colleges, "human resource development" as a member of society and family (a member of the smallest unit to live together), which is the basis for developing professional human resources. As an education (emotional education), it was thought that it was a place for learning such as "noticing one's role from the perspective and situation of others".(Hirata)
