Abstract	Purpose: To analyze foster parents raising social care children, identify troubling matters concerning the Maternal-child health handbook, and obtain suggestions for foster care support in the area. Methods: We conducted an anonymous self-report questionnaire survey among foster parents nationwide and analyzed the contents of 147 entries among 502 effective responses for each Maternal-child handbook from the free description field. Results: There are five categories with regard to "direct troubles" of the "Maternal-child handbooks" such as "there are no Maternal-child handbook," "there is extremely little information," "information on biological parents," "design is different" and "do not know how to use." Seven "secondary troubles" categories were obtained, such as the inability to answer questions on related health organizations, medical care and school, considerations of foster children. Conclusion: The Maternal-child handbook has revealed troubles unique to the foster parent. Because foster parents require essential information sources before nurturing and even during child rearing, it was suggested that the municipalities to which biological and foster parents belong respond flexibly to the specific needs of foster parents.
