Abstract	Since psychodrama involves the process of actualizing recalled memories, we examined whether there was a change in the scale of autobiographical memory functions when university students simply recalled autobiographical memories about their families and after they reenacted them in psychodrama. Data analysis of 19 participants who experienced the psychodrama revealed that many functions of autobiographical memory were activated by the psychodrama, and some of them were activated only when the participants took the protagonist's role.
