Abstract	Objective: To clarify the concepts underlying the attitude (solid expectation) of mothers toward continuing breast-feeding. Methods: Rodgers' evolutionary concept analysis was used to review 28 published studies from the mothers' perspective that matched the theme of the present study. Results: Four attributes were identified (intention to breastfeed, enhanced sense of self-efficacy regarding breastfeeding, motivation to continue breast-feeding, and new knowledge/experience obtained while breastfeeding), along with three antecedents (knowledge of an advantage of breast-feeding, previous experience with breastfeeding, and acknowledgment of social support) and two consequences (favorable mother-child relationship and growth as a mother). Discussion : components of a mother's belief that she will continue breastfeeding was suggested with the social support with which a mother surrounds herself and a mother. Conclusions: The attitude of mothers toward continuing breast-feeding can be summarized as follows: a intention to breast-feed, enhanced feeling of self-efficacy regarding breast-feeding, the will to continue breast-feeding and ability to cope with stress, and motivation to continue breast-feeding based on new knowledge/experience obtained through breast-feeding. While providing support for mothers, this concept could be applied when encouraging them to breast-feed.
