Abstract	This study aimed to clarify the social background of sons who were taking care of their frail elderly mothers and how it has changed in the past several decades. The social background of caregiving sons was analyzed using statistical data published by the government and other public institutions. It is expected that households consisting of parents and single sons will continue to increase in the future, and inevitably the number of caregiving sons will also rise. Caregiving sons accounted for the highest proportion of perpetrators of elder abuse, and social isolation and economic distress might be the contributing background factors. Many employees facing the need to care for frail parents suffered from incompatibility of work and caregiving, because information on caring was not sufficiently delivered to them by their company. We considered that caregiving sons might be affected by gender norms, and that the division of gender roles was influenced by the ethos of the era in which mothers and their sons lived. It is necessary to create a support system in the community so that caregiving sons are not isolated. It is also important for companies to deliver information on caring in advance and to establish a consultation desk within the company. Furthermore, care professionals need to understand the feelings of caregiving sons who are under pressure of gender norms, and to support them in their caregiving so that they can accept the care situation positively
