Abstract	Discussions on the definition and position of social medicine at the time of the founding of the Society for Social Medicine were reviewed, and the sixty years history of the Society for Social Medicine was discussed. I mentioned, as practical research on social medicine, "A Visit in the 14th Year" by Hiroshi Maruyama; elucidation of the damage caused by Arsenic Milk Poisoning by Morinaga Milk Company, and the efforts of Masazumi Harada to tackle Minamata disease. These two studies have in common that they elucidated the facts from the standpoint of affected patients and supported the pursuit of social justice and human rights through trials. Finally, we discussed the prospects of social medicine and future design, and raised the following three points as pillars. First, social medicine investigates the social factors that affect health and disease, and the consequent effects on society and life as results of disease, from a broad perspective, including various human groups, social classes, regional disparities, and various socioeconomic conditions. Second, social medicine studies social activities and systems aimed at eliminating and preventing social causes that adversely affect health and disease. Public health, medical care, and social welfare are also part of such systems, and the research on them is also included. Third, when people's health is being damaged due to social causes, researchers of social medicine respect the position of the affected people and investigate the fact of the damage, social causes and its structure.
