Abstract	The "realization of a community-based symbiotic society" is no longer just a slogan. The promotion of community welfare is the responsibility of the national and local governments. The key issue here is whether local governments can build a support system in a bottom-up direction, rather than promoting it as a top-down policy. Behind the demand for a new comprehensive support system, there are many cases that fall in between the so-called "in-between systems" that the conventional vertical system by field cannot accommodate. It is necessary to accept such issues as local problems, and to discuss and cooperate with each other to solve them. Of course, public systems and services are important. However, the creation of community welfare through "resident autonomy" is the key to resident-led community welfare. It is not an alternative and limited approach in which local residents are responsible for services. The promotion of community welfare is no longer the responsibility of local residents alone. It is important to build "community welfare governance" with this resident autonomy at its core, including the government, businesses, and companies. The sustainability of the long-term care insurance system is largely dependent on population trends. Now is the time when population is not a given condition, but a goal to improve the birth rate, which is to be realized through social security measures. It is also true that the development of social security and social welfare is becoming closely related to regional, economic, and population issues.
